If you are an active Internet user you probably know about famous adware programs like AdRemover or AdAware which could be considered "fire and forget" applications. Basically, they detect ad-related issues and file them for your reference. However, this is not the only way malicious programs can affect your system. Sometimes the application you need to be alerted of are quite small and therefore the most dangerous are not the ones running on your PC, but rather in memory. For example, malformed DLLs (Dynamic Link Library), executable files or PE (Portable Executable) archive files with malicious additional code could be responsible for your system crash. You may have thought that whenever you visit a certain website your browser displays the warning messages, but this is not the case. Some malformed executable files could load only when you visit certain websites or open certain files. This makes them invisible to you. From now on you will have control over programs with networking features, once suspicious connection is noticed you will be able to close it or even terminate the risky program. ⬜ Unfortunately instead of one, Windows has many, more or less known, ways to start some third party program. This gives many headaches to users since it can be really hard to keep an eye on all of them. Malware exploits this by trying to unnoticeable auto start, not rarely using those less known methods. With the Startup Guardian you will be able to take your auto-started programs under control. ⬜ Windows folder is an often hideout place for malicious software. Thus it is the most often place where malware installs it selves. With this feature you can list all unknown programs in the Windows folder with much information about them. Windows Guardian will examine the programs, find the product to which they belong, analyze them and mark with the appropriate risk color. ☐ Microsoft's Internet Explorer web browser is the integral part of every Windows and thus most widely used browser today, but also it's probably the most malware susceptible part of your system.
